Q: Git - Adding or changing files in feature branch and its master branch As a part of a requirement, I need to add some files to master branch of a Git repository. I created a new branch - feature, where I am working on it. I used the below command to add my file(s) - git add -A I created another branch - master where I want to see the changes in the files. I used - git checkout master git pull origin master But I get an error - fatal error: currently checked out branch is not the same as the remote branch. I am unable to understand what is happening? A: If you're on the master branch, and there's nothing staged or staged for commit yet, you don't actually want to git checkout master; you want to git checkout --track master (or git checkout -t, for short). That does the right thing for the master branch, and creates a new tracking branch in your work-tree. The fact that it has the same name as the "normal" master branch doesn't matter. You can use git branch -v or git branch --rev to look up the master branch, but when you're on the master branch you don't want to git checkout master; you want git checkout --track master. To ensure a proper dose of energy, you must let the sun go down first and then work hard. You can't outrun a slowdown; you can't outwork a bad attitude. After work, one of my top priorities is to rest and relax, and in order to do that, I need to find ways to unwind after a day at the office. My wife suggested that I consider the Beach Log, the new mattress from Westin. The company sells its signature mattresses in the U.S. but this would be the first time that a Beach Log would be made in the Philippines, with much of the production done in the Philippines. The Beach Log is a 100% cotton mattress that floats in the ocean like a sea turtle, but unlike the turtle 82157476af
